ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

This work is a result of many people's contributions; as such it is difficult to mention and thank by name all those who have made an input in one way or another. I would like to apologise to all those who contributed and are not mentioned by names but whose contributions are highly appreciated. Nevertheless, the role of some individuals and institutions cannot go without mention. In the first place, I must register my heartfelt thanks to my supervisor Professor Frederick J. Kaijage for putting so much of his talent, professionalism and experience into seeing that this work reached this stage. Prof. Kaijage cheerfully and generously shared his exemplary intellectual wealth with me. I also thank him for his valuable criticism, guidance and understanding. I also recognise the late K.I. Tambila who served as the Head of Department at the point of my addimissio and was appointed to serve as my second supervisor but was prevented from playing this role by his ill health and untimely death.

I sincerely thank Kyambogo University for awarding me a scholarship which enabled me to pursue graduate studies at the University of Dar es Salaam. The University also granted me study leave, funded my research and provided me with a wide range of support. In particular I wish to thank Prof. Opuda Asibo, Esther Musiime and Dr. Michael B. Kadoodoba for their immeasurable support. I also owe very special gratitude to the organisations that availed funds that enabled me to write this thesis. In a special way I thank the Social Science Research Council which awarded me a Proposal Development Fellowship and a Dissertation Completion Fellowship through the Next Generation Social Sciences in Africa Programme, with fund provided by Carnegie Corporation of New York. Special thanks go to Thomas Asher for his immense support. In the same vein, I am grateful to the African Humanities Programme for supporting my

ABSTRACT

This study investigated the land question in socio-political conflicts in Bukedi and Bugisu in eastern Uganda. It specifically examines the origin of the land question in Bukedi and Bugisu and how it evolved over time; assesses the impact of colonial and post-colonial land policies on land relations, and how the latter related to socio-political conflicts in Bukedi and Bugisu. The study employed the evolutionary theory to explore the changing tenure regimes since pre-colonial times and how these led to pressing land issues in this area. It also employs the social conflict theory to link land-related issues to socio-political conflicts in Bukedi and Bugisu. A case study research design using a qualitative approach was employed. This approach mainly depended on three categories of sources to collect primary and secondary data: these were archives, oral interviews and published sources. The findings in this study show that the land question in Bukedi and Bugisu had its origins in the diverse local land tenure regimes of the pre-colonial societies that later made up these districts. It also shows that ill-conceived colonial land policies escalated the land question, which in turn led to socio-political conflicts between communities, families and individuals in Bukedi and Bugisu. The study further reveals that people's perceptions of the land policies put in place during the postcolonial period evoked emotional responses and political actions, which raised questions over issues of land ownership, distribution, use, as well as resource management and, ultimately, identity and citizenship rights. Contentions over such issues led to socio-political conflicts in many parts of Bukedi and Bugisu. The study concludes that most patterns of socio-political conflicts in Bukedi and Bugisu are linked to long-standing issues concerning land ownership and access rights from pre-colonial times through the colonial to the post-colonial period.
